

SCREEN STUDIES MINOR

Passionate about the Art of Moving Images?

Looking for a Competitive Edge in Today's Marketplace?

You should consider a minor in Screen Studies...

As electronic communication continues to redefine how business is conducted, film and video is increasingly becoming the professional language of choice. Students graduating with a mastery of visual storytelling are entering the workforce with a powerful leg up in industries across the board.

In addition to the traditional arenas of entertainment media, employers from an array of industries – from publishing, news and government to business, science and medicine – are looking for creative young minds with a firm grasp on visual mechanisms to better communicate products, services and new ideas.

Monmouth University's Screen Studies Minor provides students of all majors with the necessary tools to compete in this changing landscape. Screen Studies students are given the opportunity to:

- Develop a comprehensive understanding of the language of visual communication and explore the power of moving images from a variety of perspectives.
- Build a broader perspective on mass culture and examine how moving images are used today in a growing number of careers.
- Create a concentrated area of study to complement any major, and examine how visual storytelling provides an intriguing context to more fully evaluate and understand related issues from a fresh perspective.
- Develop expertise in a particular area of screen studies.
