

Law School Info for Monmouth Students

The information regarding the admissions process to law school can be daunting at times, but the Law School Admission Council website may help you navigate it. While it would be nice to provide our students with a concise rubric on the procedure for taking the LSATs and then applying to their preferred school or schools, the entire process is vulnerable to changes from those organizations that comprise the whole. This being said, we have opted to provide you with the resources used by people already in attendance at various law schools or in practice at many firms:

The Law School Admission Council Web site: <http://www.lsac.org/>

Website contains information about the LSAT (including test dates and registration), law school applications, FAQs, and approved schools.

Another website to consider when deciding where to apply, is this one, devoted to the rankings of different law schools: <http://top-law-schools.com/rankings.html>

TEST PREPARATION

As with any major standardized test, there are organizations that will help you to prepare and compete in those tests. Your competition, when it comes to the LSAT, will almost certainly be taking courses in test preparation at either Kaplan or Princeton Review, so it is strongly advised that you do the same. Here are links to their LSAT preparation courses.
