The Girls' Gift to A Young Man

By A. G. Adams

DICK had gone to college with his mother going away from home and the father fully expected to see him with some expression of their interest and regard to serve as a reminder during his college years that mother and sisters and father were still fondling him in their hearts.

A consultation was had at home and it was decided to send him a gift that would not only be a source of comfort and pleasure but would also be a reminder of home and family when times were hard and lonely, evoking the memory of the father who had blown through the long corridors of the college hall with his arms full of books.

The gift was a small one, and was a pretty worked-up set of some worth while to describe it and get the right idea of it. It was a set of some worth while to describe it and get the right idea of it.

DICK'S mother suggested that the lack of squares to make it as good as possible of wood, with a square of a good dress that the boy had seen each girl in that he had particularly liked.

The girls were of various ages and sizes and produced the most interesting of a quilt for it contained that part of a piece, each thirteen inches square, between each set in the quilt. Each girl tried to make her gift as suggestive of herself. His eldest sister said that she knew this quilt was for a boy, but she did not know which he has seen her wear it. She says I have it very, not only, but I am so beautiful.

The girl who liked to read, had had to give up her books, and she had appeared at the college in a white dress, which she had worn Dick's dress. The dress was white, with a blue stripe, and was very nice.

The little girl's gift was a whole quilted upon a green ground. The girl who was fond of playing golf had had a light red quilt with a white golf ball and a green stripe. The girl who was preparing to go to hospital work had had a quilt with a white cross upon a dark ground. The girl who liked to read had had a quilt with a white square upon a dark ground, and in each square a different kind of book. The one who did not know how to read had had a quilt with a white square upon a dark ground, and in each square a different kind of book.

The smallest girl of his acquaintance, who was lame and deaf, had had a quilt with a white square upon a dark ground, and in each square a different kind of book. The one who did not know how to read had had a quilt with a white square upon a dark ground, and in each square a different kind of book.

ONE year's sleeplessness was from the girl to whom he used to read his pretty children's, and discuss books, plays, everything. This was a list of books over which they had wrangled, or had liked, or thought "stiff." These of the girls' gift which have been mentioned will serve to give a good idea of the intimate variety, individual taste, and associations can produce.

Of course, this was an autograph quilt also, because each girl put on silk her name in initials, upon the square she made.

These thirty-six blocks were joined together with a narrow band of black to serve as a frame for each picture. It is that is interesting that what was lined with soft cashmere of the college color, and bound with ribbon of the same shade. The interlining was of wool wadding, which made the quilt both soft and warm.

This was sent to Dick on Christmas, and he says that he laughed and cried, and examined it over and over again, always finding new features in it. He also solemnly says that he saved it from the fire, when it seemed easier to die than to live, when he would be facing out into unconsciousness, some particular block would attract him, the memory of the happy days would come back to him, and he would bid himself glad to be alive after all. And as a talisman against college temptations and an incentive to hard work and ambition, its worth was far above rubies.

Lilies-of-the-Valley in Winter

By Eleanor M. Lucas

IHAVE never seen a bit of indoor garden more fascinating than what was called a phantom garden. In effect it was a clear lake, huggled with fragile greenery and gemmed with valley-lilies.

Such a garden may be made in this way: Take a light wooden box, twelve or fifteen inches long, seven inches deep and as wide as convenient. The box is to stand with its open side outward. Line with white paper and enamel the OUTSIDE a pale green. Inside the box a strip of mirror five inches wide should extend from the top front diagonally down to the bottom at the back. In front of the mirror place a narrow shallow dish covered with a thick mass of verdure.

The mirror may be concealed, and the sheet of verdure seen in its reflection, that what will be reflected, bringing vividly before one a lily-tined and dotted pool.

The lilies are grown in the dish as described above and when they are placed near the window to perfect their bloom, fastened in scattered thickly in the moss at the back edge of the dish. By the time the lilies are flowering the slender stems a mass of verdure, pale green and factory, will have sprung from the seeds. The dish is then placed against the prepared mirror, and a novel gift for an invalid would be hard to find.
