As though in celebration of that umph, the dogwood trees flower in month of May—50,000 of them. They were always native dogwoods at Valley Forge; in modern times thousands more, both pink and white, have been planted by the commission. Through this both rich and poor alike have contributed to the beauty of Valley Forge Park. Sunday-school children pledged the $100 for the building of a chapel. Millionaires added in proportion, inspired the enthusiasm and the clear patriotic dream of the Rev. W. Herbert Butler, whose original idea it was to build here a house of worship where faith in God and love of country should be blended. There has risen that national anthem dome of stone, the Washington Memorial Chapel, with its glorious stained-glass windows glowing with red and blue, which depict the birth of the Republic, and its carillon of forty-nine bells, one for each state plus a birthday bell for the Union.

MY OWN MONEY

other virtues it didn't matter. "My father's not a money man," she would say. "Never was and never will be. I guess nobody's a lot smarter, or a better husband or father. Living with him has been more fun than traveling all over the world. I guess we've been so happy we've never missed the things that other people say you need to be happy."

Candy had always accepted this, now she wondered whether her mother hadn't just been trying to convince herself all these years. She had stretched the money in the miraculous way that women have with money, to cover everything they'd ever really needed, but must have got tired of it. She must have got tired of never being able to splurge even a little bit.

Of course she had. Because look a way her face had lit up when Candy brought her home that pin out of her first pay check. Just a little gold pin with a blue stone that matched her mother's eyes, but she had thought it was wonderful.

"Why, Candy," she had kept saying, "Why, Candy!"

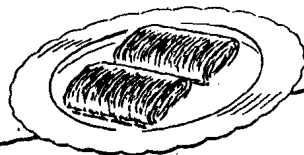

She had bought pop a good cigar because he loved cigars, but could he ever afford to buy good ones, and for a new baseball bat, and she had bought them, and watched them all with the thing she had bought them, and she had felt how had she felt? Like the good-looking Santa Claus—like somebody new in the family, somebody new and important.

Now she ran up the steps, slanted the screen door behind her, and called out, "Who's home?"

Mrs. Sherwin came out of the kitchen. You could tell that she had once been
