THIS MARRIAGE continued

Josh and I were very close. I thought, and I was happy. I also had a car to drive, the first car I had ever owned.

"But toward the end of the year Josh suggested that we conceive a child. He thought his father, who was sinking steadily, ought to have a chance to see a grandson who would carry on the family name. At that point, we were dependent on my paycheck, and I wasn't ready to have a baby for my father-in-law's benefit. But I reminded myself of my resolutions.

"We had Billy and then—bing!—along came Sam, who was unplanned. Billy was a darling, healthy baby. Sam was just the opposite. For ten months Sam cried constantly with colic, asthma, bronchitis and colds. I quit work, sold my car and stayed home.

"Our high pediatrician bills forced us to move from a pleasant apartment building occupied by other young couples to a cheaper backyard rental, which is impossible to keep tidy even when I try. We have no storage space, and we are miles from the nearest shopping center.

"Before I went back to work I was stuck day after day with two crying youngsters. I nearly went mad. I spanked Billy when he didn't deserve spanking. I yelled at him and the baby. I had begun changing into a despicable person when, at the suggestion of our pastor, I found a part-time job.

"The job made a tremendous difference. I have a car again and I have congenial girl friends to talk to at the lab. Billy and Sam got acquainted with their father, and I've become a better mother. I dread the idea of giving up my work and staying home again. But maybe I should. I would rather lose my job than lose my marriage, that's for sure."

The Counselor's Turn

"Janey and Josh were considerably more alike in basic personality than either realized," the counselor said. "To be sure, they reacted differently to deeply entrenched feelings of rejection and emotional deprivations, but only on the surface. Janey babbled, talked a blue streak and dispensed cheery smiles; Josh remained glum, obstinate, silent. But their inner feelings were very similar. Janey, who had obediently tended a string of little sisters, grew up submissive and resentful. Josh, too, was submissive and resentful. Both he and his ailing, namby-pamby father were kept under the thumb of a domineering woman. Worse still, he grew up in the shadow of a dead brother whose legendary genius he could never hope to equal.

"Both Janey and Josh were highly self-centered. Josh subconsciously expected Janey to make up for everything he had missed in childhood; she expected the same of him. Neither was prepared to supply leadership in their home. Josh wanted to be regarded as head of the household but was unwilling to assume responsibility. Janey took the lead only because he abdicated it. She hoped to please, but Josh—deprived of the leadership he declined to claim—wasn't pleased.

"In a sense, it might be said that Janey and Josh first became acquainted with each other in my counseling office. I explained to them their basic conflict and inner drives. For the first
